DIALOGUES ON SHELLS IN A PESTALOZZIAN SCHOOL (a sketch from the history of pedagogics)

The sketch is devoted to examination of ways of teaching of conchology (= shell science) in the European education system and family training in XVIII and XIX centuries. The attempts of various authors to use dialogical method in the teaching of conchology are reviewed. These attempts varied from relatively simple "conchological catechisms" to full-developed methodical handbooks for teachers. The use of conchological training in the Pestalozzian pedagogics is considered. The Pestalozzian schools and teachers aimed to develop cognitive skills of children rather than to supply them with prepared knowledge. In such schools, the study of shells was not a self-dependent target but used as a means for development of pupils' "perceptive forces" and education of piety through contemplation of the divine Providence that manifest itself in perfection of shells and the ideal correspondence between their structure and habitats.
